Subject: Re: stop issuing software patents

To USPTO:

Software patents unfairly and irrationally inhibit software developers, and establish an atmosphere of legal bullying that discourages software development, competition and innovation.

The consequences of allowing software patents not only include the likelihood of the U.S. losing developers to more software-friendly countries, but also the very serious, near-total lack of competitive software on the market that's essential to keeping prices in check while encouraging high performance software products.

Stop issuing software patents.

Sincerely,

Mike Daymon
